The Changing World Lecture IT heD eadlock in Religion, Science, and Art Friends :if you stand on the seashore when the tide is flowing inwards, and if you watch the waves as they ripple up, one after another, each coming aH ttle further than its predecessor, each in turn breaking and making way for its follower in the inflowing tide you have a picture of the evolving races of mankind. And if you watch the method of the flow, you will notice that that which is the most prominent at the moment is not the one which creeps furthest up the sands. The wave which is breaking into foam, which is rippling over the pebbles, which throws up the broken water, which falls back on to the land and makes music, sound, melody as it breaks that is the wave which is nearly over; it is the wave whose course is run.
